improvement; and, if our hearts are rightly disposed, we finall find, is the confeious improvement of our minds and morals, one of the sweetest pleasures of which our nature it espable.

However unreationable the excellive dread of spproaching old age in either (ex, it is certainly more excufable on many accounts, in women than in men. In men it is a mark of weekness, want of principle, and men it is a mark of weekners, want of principle, and want of fende. Yet how many do we daily fee with wrinkled brown and bloodleft cheeks, and tottering legs want of tente. Yet now many to be cally the win winkled brows and bloodless checks, and tottering legs are heary locks, decorating their walking theletons with every cofficient art, and hanting every feem of vice and vanity with all the wantonnels of a firripling of eighteen! There is a natural digostry, authority, and hearty, in old bge, honourably supported, which sich men refign for that ablurd affethation of youth, which can only reader them writtened and redictions.

To consider the advanced periods of life as of no value, arguer's great defed of religious principle. They consistent the proper feation for the pleasures of derotion and of practical piety. They formish a most defering and artistable perfection, and fulfilling the purpose of our critience by benevolence and beneficience. They enable us to after a size, and yet obtain it at beauty which shall not pass away, and that youth which shall be IMMORTAL!
