

From a late LONDON PAPER.
THE BRUSH MAKER.

A NEW SONG.

THAT my calling is useful, I'll make it appear;
To every one present, I'll prove it full clear;
And hope to industry you'll all be incited,

So pick, as you want them, a brush to your mind.

I've a brush for your coat, or a brush for your shoes,
A brush for a sweep, let him come if he choose;
I've a brush for the table, a brush for the floor;
A brush for a painter, what wou'd you have more?

That we're all brothers, Brother, 'tis certainly true,
As well as we can we brush the world through;
For mark (if you please) and you'll find 'tis the plan,
With greatest and with least, 'tis brush as brush can.

From his client, the lawyer he brushes his fee,
The doctor his patient, he brushes you'll see;
The poet and critic, still brush different ways,
But each brushes alike, to gain profit and praise.

The grave politician of wonderful weight,
With his wisdom and knowledge, will brush up the Rate;

And the parson likewise, he is seldom perplex'd,
When found in the pulpit, to brush up his text.

Each rank and degree that would make a bold push,
To gain what they aim at set out with a brush;
I'm happy with brushing your time to prolong,
So sit, I'll now brush an end to my song.

A FRAGMENT.
"To each his suffering: All are men
"Condemn'd alike to err;
"The tender for another's pain,
"The unfeeling for his own."

G R A T.

"A miserable mortal that I am!" said SYLVIA, while the big tear stole down her lovely cheek—"He is gone—the lovely youth, in whom all my prospects of happiness centered, is drawing his last breath—Shall I never see him more?—Are we to part forever?—Ah no! I shall meet him again in another world—we shall yet be happy with each other.—Why then should I thus grieve?" The hand of my son on the threshold started her;—she looked up, and knowing that I overheard her moving filly, she endeavoured to hide her tears; she forced a smile as I passed her, but neither of us could utter a word. I went into the room where her lover lay—"shrieking in the pains of death." The room was darkened; his mother sat by his bed side—"Wild was her lookless eye, and rolling shake,
"Anguish unutterable."

His father walked slowly and softly across the room—his brothers and sisters weeping—the physician about to take his last leave of his dying patient.—Such a scene—who can describe?—It was too much for me to bear—I walked out of the room.—Well may SYLVIA weep, thought—D'Artagnan was handsome—was brave—he was benevolent—was a man of genius and abilities, and had the advantage of a good education. He loved SYLVIA with a ardor unknown to the fashions of the day; for he was a person of strict honesty and integrity—he was indeed a Christian. But he is gone! SYLVIA wept, and who could refrain from weeping? She, however, had christian hope and fortitude—she consoled her self that she should again see him. "The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

—I walked, penitive and melancholy, towards my lodgings. Here another scene of distress presented itself—"Lord have mercy!" said MAXIM, "was ever mortal so tormented as I am! I shall not go—I cannot go without the exp—O my grief! what a disappointment!"—Here she burst into tears.—What can be the matter, Maxim? said I—"O Mr. ***," said she, "I am the most miserable of women; I have an invitation this evening to a meeting at the b—ch of a millionaire; he has not finished my cap—I would not for all the world have been so disappointed."—Alas! Max'm, said I, only think of SYLVIA. Dauphin it is; yet she conforms herself and appears serene and composed; while fed for a trifling disappointment, distract yourself with passion.—"Ha," said with a grim, "talk of losing a lover as a misfortune of such magnitude, it is a mere trifl—nothing—why I can have a hundred of them for a wint, but to be disappointed of going to a wedd—when we do not have an opportunity of seeing one once a year, is too much—what woman can bear it?" O that I was ever born to be tormented! Here she again burst into tears, and wept aloud. I left her, and hastened to my room.—Alas, Maria! said I, there are more to be pitied than SYLVIA! the Lord has sent her affliction, and he has sent her fortitude, and patience to support herself; those afflictions for nothing, where will thou find support, thy grief is greater than hers, though the cause of it, when compared with hers, dwindles to nothing, nuch difference there is between the affliction sent us by our maker, and that we foolishly bring upon ourselves.

M A X I M.

Use no Oaths; but keep your word without swearing.
REFLECTION.

THIS is what the Scythians said to Alexander the Great. We learn from that maxim, that we should never swear, unless we are necessarily obliged to; When I hear any body swear, without any necessity, I am apt to believe that he does it, because his conscience tells him, that he does not deserve to be believed upon his mere word. I am never imposed upon by swearing men; I look upon them as men, who having got the habit of swearing do not consider the ill consequences of it, or care so little for it, that it is indifferent to them whether they be sincere in their oaths or not; for habits are commonly attended with indifference and want of attention. Do not we see some men, who having such a habit, never speak without swearing, & without inizing the most sacred things with their oaths, who swear out of anger and detachery, to pass away the time, without any reason, without any attention, sin, or design in it, and without being able to show what advantage they get by it? Their oaths serve them instead of traditions in their discourses; to swear and speak is the same thing to them; for if they were contented to speak without swearing, they would not be so much abhorred by wise men. Their oaths bind the good things they say, and raise the indignation of honest men against them. I take every swearer to be a profane, or an insconsiderate, or a loose man, or one, whose education has been very much neglected: Every one of those things, is odious to an honest man.

From the GAZETTE of the UNITED STATES.
Mr. PRINTER.

Some modern European Philosophers have furnished the American Papers with a comparative Sketch of the Civilized Man and the Savage; you will please to publish it as a counterpart.

The SAVAGE and the CIVILIZED MAN.

*T*HIS Savage rises in the morning and prowls thro' the forest for food—if he finds it, he returns loaded to his wife, who cooks it for him; her portion is, what he may leave of the hairy repast; if he is unsuccessful in hunting, he takes in an additional hole in his girdle, and his family pines in want.

The civilized MAN gets up with the sun—purifies his daily occupations—and the sure prospect of reward for his industry, lightens the burthen of life—while the arts of civilization afford a permanent security against hunger, nakedness and cold.

The Savage has precarious support—nature, it is true, provides the crystal stream, and his bow may slop the deer in its course—but the stream is often remote, and the track of the arrow, frequently untrue.

The civilized man may struggle with misfortunes; but he has a never failing resource in the benevolence of society.

The inhabitant of the woods has but few ideas, and few pleasures—these are of the ardent kind, and their acquisition often interferes with those of his fellow Savages—the consequences are fatal.

The civilized MAN has a boundless circle of enjoyments—his views are expanded, his ideas unlimited; his hopes are excited by enumerable objects, and gratified ten thousand different ways. The legal restraints on his pleasures, appetites and passions, enlarge the sphere of his felicity.

The Savage, disengaged from the chase, or war, leads a life of stupid, infelicitous—there can scarcely be said to be heavy proffits, or succession of events, in his existence—it is one perpetual now.

The civilized Man lives in himself—in his children—in the public;—and, as he participates in his labors, he enjoys the happiness of his country and of mankind.

The Savage feels no anxiety for the future welfare of his family, however numerous it may be;

he propagates his kind like the wolf of the desert, and his offspring are abandoned to a wayward fate.

The care, the solicitudes, the anticipations and pleasures of life, are equally unknown to him.

The civilized Man has his cultivated faculties continually employed to promote the happiness of his family—every addition to it is a new pledge of future enjoyment. He feels the protection of civil government, and cheerfully contributes to its support—protected in his acquisitions by law, he contemplates the transmission of his name, his inheritance, his rights and privileges to his posterity, with unpeakeable pleasure.

The Savage has no abiding place; his only defence from the inclemency of the skies, is in his case hardened carcass.

The civilized Man, wisely calculating for the future contingencies of the seasons, in the retreat rear'd by the joint labors of associated industry, "smiles at the tempest, and enjoys the storm."

The Savage, while young, feels and glories in the vigour of his nerves; like the young colt, he sniffs the wind, and braves the tempest—but mark his declining years—very early fears his vigour, and the hanging down drawn lip of the aged Savage, fully evinces that his last is not his best day.

The civilized Man preserves by temperance, the vigour of youth until an advanced period—his declining years are crowned with respect and veneration—and his last repose is in the arms of filial affection.

Extracted from an elegant SERMON, delivered in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, on the 19th of June 1791, before the Corporation for the relief of the widows and children of Clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland, by the Rev. JOHN BRITTON.

A YOUNG man of a liberal education and an ingenious mind, whose heart glows with the love of evangelical truth, and with a desire to communicate the same to others, follows the dictates of conscience & the spirit of God, in devoting himself to the service of the altar. Innocent himself, he apprehends neither guilt nor ingratitude in the world: Infused with a noble ardor in the cause of truth and godliness, he hopes that for his last twelve months.

The circuit court upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their enquiry, in their opinion, the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the circuit court, for the last twelve months.

The circuit court upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their enquiry, in their opinion, the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the circuit court, for the last twelve months.

The circuit court upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their enquiry, in their opinion, the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the circuit court, for the last twelve months.

And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the district court, in each district, shall publish this act in such places as the Judge of the district court shall direct, to give general information thereof to the people of the district, and shall give like information of the times and places of holding, the circuit courts in each district. And in districts wherein a circuit court is not directed by law to hold, the judge of the district court shall, and be thereto authorized to exercise all the powers given by this act to the circuit court, to the place where the said court shall be held, five days at least, from the time of opening the session thereof, that persons disabled as aforesaid, may have full opportunity to make their application for the pension by this act.

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State, upon receipt of the proofs, certificates and opinion aforesaid, shall cause the same to be duly filed in the office, and place the name of such applicant on the pension list of the United States, in conformity thereto.

Provided always, That in any case, where the said secretary shall have cause to suspect imposition or malice, he shall have power to withhold the name of such applicant from the pension list, and make report of the same to Congress; at their next session.

And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers, soldiers, and seamen, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, whose disability and rate-of-all allowance have been ascertained, pursuant to the regulations prescribed by the late Congress, and have not applied to be placed on the pension list, until after the time limited by the act of Congress for that purpose, was expired, shall now be placed on the pension list, and be entitled to demand and receive their respective pension according to the allowances ascertained aforesaid, anything in this act or any act of the late Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of one thousand dollars, be and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid to the widow of the late General Wayne, for the support of his widow, and his family, during the term of three years, and to be disbursed by the Secretary of War, in such manner as he shall direct.
