

ANNA or ADIEU,

WHEN the fails catch the breeze, and the anchor is weigh'd,
To bear me from Anna, my beautiful maid,
The top-mast reeling, I look for my dear,
And find that her features imperfect appear;
Till aided by fancy, her charm I still trace,
And for me the tears trickle down her pale face,
While her handkerchief waving toiling my view,
And I hear her sweet lips sadly sing out ADIEU.

The pleasing delusions not long can prevail,
Higher rise the proud waves; and more brisk blow the gale;

The gale that regards not the sights that it bears;
The proud waves still onward, the augmented by tears;

Ah! will ye not one single moment delay.

Oh! think from what rapture you bear me away!

Then my eyes strain in vain my dear ANNA to view,

And a tear drops from each, as I figh'd out ADIEU.

Yet some comfort it gives to my agoniz'd mind,

That I shall see the land where I left her behind;

The land that gave birth to my charmer and me,

Tho' leftin' my eyes beam with pleasure to see;

It's the easiest that holds all that's dear to my heart;

It's the heaviest when yet we shall meet no' to part,

If the fates are propitious to lovers to sue;

But if not, deah Anna's long, long ADIEU!

The Prayer of a wife Husband.

CREAT love that one perfect grant;

(Thou knowest well what mortals want);

All'd uplift'd, what's goodly;

What's evil—our prayers deny!

A N E C D O T E S.

A SHOEMAKER of Dublin had a longing desire to write for Dean Swift. He was recommended by Mr. James Swift, the banker, and Mr. Siccas a merchant. "The Dean gave him an order for a pair of boots; adding, 'When shall I have them?'" On Saturday next said the shoemaker, "I have disappointment," said the Dean, "nor would I have you disappoint others; set your own time and keep to it." "Thank your reverence," said Bannister, for that was his name, "I defer no longer time than Saturday evening, when you will be free to have them without fail." They parted; and the boots were finished to the time; but through the hurry of business, Mr. Bannister forgot to carry them home till Monday evening. When the Dean drew the boots on, and found them to his mind, he said, "Mr. Bannister, you have the commendation of your friends, but you have disappointed me, for I was to have been Sir Arthur Asheford, in the county of Armagh on this day." "Indeed and indeed, Sir," said Bannister, "the boots were finished to the time, but I forgot to bring them home." — The Dean gave him a pair of his best looks; and after a pause said him, "Whether he understood gardening as well as boot making," Bannister answered, "No, Sir; but I have seen very good gardeners in England." "Come (said the Dean, in a good-humoured tone) I will show you what improvements I have made in the treasery garden." — They walked through the garden to the further end which the Dean staid at as recollecting something, "I must step in (said he) lay here until I come back;" then he run out of his garden, locked the door & put the key in his pocket. Bannister walked about until it grew dark, and not seeing the Dean, he at last returned to follow him; but found the door locked; he knocked and called several times to no purpose; he perceived himself confined between two walls, the night dark and cold. However, he had not the least suspicion of being intentionally confined.

The Deanservants went to bed at the usual hour, and the Dean remained in his study until two o'clock in the morning. He then went into the hall, and drew the curtains of a lumberous, and other fine arches, there strewed and rung the bell. He was immediately attended by one of his servants. "Robert (said he) I have been much disturbed with noise on the garden side. I fear some robbers have broke in; give me a lantern, and call up Saunders." — Then the Dean took the lantern, and laid by the arms until the men came. "Arm yourselves (said he) and follow me." He led them into the garden, where the light soon attracted poor Bannister, who came up to them. Upon his approach the Dean roared out, "There's the robber, shoot him, shoot him." Saunders prentended, and Mr. Bannister, terrified to death, fell on his knees, and begged his life. "The Dean held the lantern up to the man's face, saying, "Merry on us! Mr. Bannister, how came you here?" "Lord, Sir," (said Bannister) "Don't you remember you left me here in the evening?" "Ah! friend (said the Dean) I forgot it; as you did the boots;" then turning round to Robert (who was his butler) he said, "give the man some warm wine, and set him safe home."

A FRENCHMAN dicing with some bricklayers, labourers, at the palace of Finno (near St. Carlos, in Italy) deplored the wretchedness of their condition, amidst so many rich peers and prelates, and highly commended the system of capitalization established in France; when one of the labourers suddenly interrupted him, and lifting up his tray of wet mortar, placed it on the Frenchman's head, saying, "Let us here try your system of equality; I carried up the last tray, do you carry this?" The Frenchman being decently dressed, was greatly enraged at the compliment, and got away as well as he could to complain of the insolence. He was heartily laughed at; and it is said that he has since left the town.

A CHILD of six years of age, being introduced into company for his extraordinary abilities, was acknowledged an eminent dignified clergyman, where God was, with the plauder reward of an orange. "Tell me (says the boy) where he is not, and I will give you two."

From Loudon's REGISTER.

"One lover to another full faced;
Another and another after that,
And the last fool's countenance as the former,
Till having lost his heart out to greater place,
And smiles with the bird that went before him."

Rowe.

O F all the curses avenging heaven ever sent upon mankind, a WICKED WOMAN surely stands first in the infernal catalogue. Habitually indulging herself in the profligies and excesses of every libertine sin can find, her principles and her character becomes blasted alike. Up to a sin—malicious as the devil—she feels the confusions of inferior attractions, and will be thought as she deserved if she might justify a conjecture of. But there are; strange anomalies in the creation, and censure is with many esteemed a delicacy. To this end the endeavours to blacken the characters of others, and establish her own slyly reputation by comparative charity. She affects politeness while the wants civility; and would be thought a well bred lady, when she does not possess the education requisite for a waiting woman. She will bribe a servant to betray his master's secrets; if his information is not sufficiently infamous, the will instruct him in the art of living; and induce him to propagate reports of scandal, the mere ideas of which gnaw her corrupted liver. She can make a negro blush by the indelicacy of her questions; and modest virtue droops whenever the briske silence.

Squandered, harsh, and framed in a causally snarled by some of equivocal character (and even then despise her in their hearts) while others, unwilling to sacrifice their fame at the hands of her vanity and pretension to character, avoid her as they would the box of Pandoræ.

Happily, those characters are generally well known. Their envenomed stings return with trebled poison to their dark bottoms; and they suffice, in this life, the torment of the dead—d'Id!

It is to be lamented, that animals of this description too often meet with countenance and encouragement from male as well as female gentry. Happy to ingratiate themselves with an object whose favours may be thought desirable for their depraved appetites, they coincide in opinions and affections derogatory to the conviction of their own selves, and become the second hand agents of calumny and falsehood.

A Receipt for the FLUX.

A S the flux is now raging with much malignancy, in many parts of the country, take the liberty of publishing the following simple cure, which after an experience of its utility, for near forty years, I will venture to recommend as a sovereign remedy.

Take two spoonfuls full of clean HICKORY or Oak ASH, quite hot, in half a gill of old Spirits, whisky or rum, morning and evening. It is a useful remedy to repeat it more than two or three days.

N. B. Let the patient observe at the time, to live on a flour diet altogether; and it would contribute much to the cure, if a warm blanket was constantly worn, next to the stomach.

To the PUBLIC.

WHEREAS in the fourteenth Edition of my Spelling Books, printed in New-York for Samuel Campbell, Robert Hodge, &c. the publishers have inserted a declaration, that that edition contains my last corrections, and that it is the most correct edition printed to date: This is to inform all persons concerned, that this declaration was inserted without my knowledge or consent; and that after examining the work, I find it the most incorrect edition I have ever seen.— There are in it between two and three hundred errors in printing, great numbers of which are material ones, not to say any thing of two or three sheets of the work which are printed on bad paper and on old worn out letter. For the information of those who wish to have correct copies of this work, I think it my duty to give public notice, that on account of the multitude of errors in this edition, I utterly disclaim it.
