On the REVOLUTIONS of COMMERCE.

THE immense variety of changes which have happened in political opinions, from the time in which it was fashionable in Europe to turn out for the purpose of wresting the holy land from the power of the Saracens down to our own times...

How uncertain the possession of commerce is how much it depends on good laws, on liberty, equisity, and a general civilization, history sufficiently proves.

There are perhaps few of the present admirers of Britain and its politics, who are acquainted with the facts, that the fleet of six frigates, not ordering to be equipped by Congress in the infancy of our marine...

Our country is very quiet—the people seem perfectly convinced of their political, and on Thursday last a meeting of some of the principal merchants took place at Parkington's Ferry...

That America has been greatly impeded upon with respect to her rights in maritime affairs, was needed not the late spoliation to convince us.
