ARCHITECTURAL SIGNIFICANCE (describe important architectural features and evaluate in terms of other buildings within community)

The house is two stories tall with high hipped roof. The three-bay facade has a central entrance with sidelights and is covered by a one-story porch with hipped roof, double Tuscan columns and balustrade. On either side of the entrance are large windows with molded cornices.

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE (explain the role owners played in local or state history and how the building relates to the development of the community)

Dryads Green was opened in 1890 as part of Hammond and Sullivan's subdivision off of Elm St., which also included Harrison Ave. George W. Cable, the well-known author, owned most of the lots on the southern and western sides of the street, and either sold lots for development or had houses built on contract and sold the property later.

This house first appears on the 1915 atlas and was owned and occupied by Timothy Collins. Mr. Collins was the local manager of the F.W. Webb Mfg. Co., and also served as an automobile agent.
